NATURAL CURIOSITY AND INTERESTING TRADITION

PECULIAR FREAK OF NATURE.

Landmark That Pointed the Way to Silver Mine of Vast Wealth Worked by Counterfeiter.

(Special to The Times-Dispatch.)

OSBORN, GA., Va., March 26.—There is a rock near the mouths of twin branches, in Cumberland Mountain, the shape of which, from its traditional associations, invites the attention of the seeker for the curious. In shape, this rock resembles the ordinary glass lamp up to the point of the burner. The stem just above the base is five or six feet in diameter and about ten feet to the point of enlargement, the whole being nearly forty feet in height. The top is rather irregular—not level—but once upon it one can walk or stand, as is seen from the accompanying illustration. The top of the rock is reached by the venturesome mountaineer by scaling the trunk of a tree which has fallen against the rock.

There is a tradition in the neighborhood in effect that this rock was a landmark of the old counterfeiter Swift, as he passed through on his way from the east to and from his silver mine, which it is said was located in the section of the Virginia-Kentucky border.

The tradition says that he and his men always rested here, and perhaps slept on the rock, to avoid the danger of the ordinary road and other vermin, which at that time infested the country in large numbers.

Perhaps, in this connection, it would be well to mention the fact that there is an old map extant, purporting to be that of the country around which the mine was located, but as there are no local names given, it is difficult to know just what section is represented, though much time has been spent in hunting for the great mass of silver which is said to be embedded in the earth. The map is accompanied by a written description, which is somewhat incoherent at points. It opens in this fashion:

"A COPY OF SWIFT'S SILVER MINE,"

"as told by himself to his friends."

Then the description recites that the creek represented by the map is about three miles in length. The furnace is on the "middle fork," under a "cliff." This mine is a mile south of the furnace, in a "fork ridge," the great pommel lying eastward. The mine is in the middle of the "seat," and is covered with a big flat rock. The ground is very "pore" round about, and there is but little timber. There is a plenty of "holly" (trees) along the creek. They could see the "first rising" of the sun from the furnace; the mills are low and flat. The adjacent country is so rough that the prospectors could not get their horses nearer than six or seven miles of the furnace. They passed between "two standing rocks" on their way to the mine. Swift's name was cut on one of them. His name was cut on a beech tree also, near the creek, and dated 1767. Mr. Mundy's name was cut on another tree, and dated 1768. Augustus's, 1762, and Jefferson's 1768. These parties are supposed to have been his companions.

Tradition has it that Swift became blind, and although he accompanied his friends to the section where the mine was located, he never could direct them to it. It is said that on his way to and from the mine he stayed at old Boss Bush's, in Russell county, about thirty miles away.

The old counterfeiter's mine is perhaps forever lost, but the rock remains to be seen, and will be associated with Swift's name for generations to come.
